.com/ The results are then shared via the web on a web page with a “thank you” message and there is a link for the user to go to the website of the given product or service for more information. A user who clicks on this link is then directed to the vendor’s website where they can then make a purchase. The user may have also been able to register a credit card at the time of the purchase to give them a real world guarantee of payment for the products or services. Businesses have little need to trust each other. They need to protect their goods and reputations. The trust is built by a third party that they trust not to steal their money and to deliver the goods they have paid for. The existence of this third party is the online store. A great example of this is eBay.

Anyone can sell on eBay and anyone can buy. The vast majority of people do not pay for the goods they buy and the vast majority of people do not sell the goods they sell. eBay is the third party. If you sell your goods on eBay you have to trust that the person is coming to your listing and seeing your product and will pay for it. But what if the person does not pay for the goods they get? What if they steal your goods? What if they shoplift? What if they put the wrong products in the wrong bags? What if they deliver the wrong stuff and have no cash on hand? What if they rip off their buyers and lie to them? What if they do not pay you and then steal from you? The reality of the online store is that no one outside of the store knows what happens on the inside. The vendor has no way of knowing if the buyer gets paid. The buyer has no way of knowing 82157476af
